

African politics.

Ethic tensions are a terrible thing in africa. they stem from differences in the way people's demeanor, as they are the same, yet they act differently because they want to or think they have to. if you were to observe the people living together anywhere, we are all human beings, yes?

This means, of course, that this is a choice. if people choose to be different, then there is a right for that. we cannot expect anybody to change just for the hell of it, or, because others tell them being left handed is wrong, yes?

This calls for a decision to be made on everything. as the people of africa are superstitious, as am i, they should call on the witch doctors to settle disputes, or, have competitions to see who is right about things. this could be like a sport or something, where various people within the sect play a game with the other side, and they see who the spirits favor for that time anyways. this is a non lethal answer to problems, of course.

When it comes to assault, this is a global problem. basically this is when someone physically attacks another person with intent to 'harm their health.' this happens, as i said, everywhere in every country at some point.

So, if there is to be a decrease in this, then there needs to be some observations made first. the first one i was pointed to was that it usually happens with people that know each other, of course. so, should there be a punishment or should there be a policy or something?

If it was down to a punishment, then the united states should be observed, as they have a very advanced angle on this. if prevention is better than cure though, i have an idea!

Now, if the media was to make fun of people that assault others, calling them names and demoralizing the people that want to assault others, they would stray away from these acts as they would see themselves as 'buffoons' if they were to assault others. this media angle could take a few days to put into place, and, then there will be much less cases of assault i fathom, yes?

Of course, if the media is to do it properly, it should ridicule the act of assault as being for people that cannot cope with reality, of course, leaving them feeling down and regret their acts - the more they regret their acts, the less assaults there will be in my estimation.

Problems in gabon have surfaced due to the narrow margin of the election win for the president who was reelected. his opponent won six of the nine provinces.

It is times like these that there should be a more american style of rule - if they were to govern their own provinces, then there would be no fighting. the high turnout for the province that supports the present president bongo was so high because they have qualms there - something that the president has failed to deal with, or, that he has favored them with. since the other provinces managed much less voters, you could say they were lazy or so, and, that being lazy means there is no problem worth voting for, yes?

This means, since they were not fighting for their rights constitutionally there was no problem. the recent surge of protests means that they want change, or, that a few people want change, probably those that voted, of course.

Because of this i am suggesting that there be no reelection. this is because everyone has had a chance, and only a few people are 'angry.' there are no massive protests, there are only a few or miserly amount of dissenters and that means that everyone is happy. i bet if you asked these people - maybe a quick survey of the suburbs and towns would do? - you will find that they think if they do not vote things will carry on the way they are, of course.

This is why i back premier bongo and his right to rule, as demonstrated now by my writing, there is great unity there.

As the parliament has been demolished, they should use the labor of those dissenters caught to rebuild, or fine them appropriately. there are no doubt finger prints on the canisters that were used - they should be fined and so forth.

The police should merely protect public sector buildings, as, the loss of these would mean a shut down of state services and other things, like service delivery, of course. policing places where the dissenters are looking for support is harmless, as they will not attack people they are trying to win over, and the president should tell his supporters to stay home, as they have no problems, and will continue not to have problems.

If countries want to recover better, they need cheap food that is edible and nutritious. it is summer time soon in the northern hemisphere, and that means that growth hormones and solid human excrement will wash away off the crops as the rain falls. this means that we can treat crops to produce two yields or a first and second yield much faster than normal if we were to connect sewers to irrigation of farms, of course.

Maybe we have gone about monetary systems wrong, or, should i dare say, maybe the impoverished should have their own money? money is worth as much as everyone says it is, or, worth as much as the other person thinks it is. this is why we can make a new money system for the poorer townfolk of the world that probably won't surface to a monetary system for a while - can you imagine trading dollars for 'sea pebbles?' feathers? plastic bottles? this is only the beginning!

So, if we were to look over the shanty dwellers, what is worth something to them? anything that can be traded is worth something to them! from stamped notes by the mayor or police as to the worthiness of a slip of paper, to actually collecting lumps of clay in the ground for resale.

Let's say, in my previous example, some woman 'digs for clay?' then she can swap clay for one of the stamped notes of the police or mayor of that town, yes? this already creates a 'barter system' that i am fond of calling it. then, the new item comes into play, and eventually, there is such a market for it, that people pay real money for these 'collections of things.'

To get a currency going, maybe we could have the police simply use a date stamp for 'the paper slip?' this would be where the newer it is, or older it is, the more it is worth, of course. the people could then have a way to swap things for 'cold hard cash,' yes? as far as the state is concerned, this money is worth nothing yet, yes?

Then, the chicken eggs and feathers from birds start to add up. then they are purchased by people doing business with them, like a newspaper delivery that comes every day that the deliver people see as a chance to get a hell of a lot of barter from something simple like a 'free newspaper.' this would of course only be relevant in that town, yes? other towns would have different barter systems and so forth, creating a new 'money market' or 'currency exchange rate.'

The problem is to get this going. if the state was to drop off a few bottles of wine, then they could swap and sell that, with the new currency being the norm for the 'pilot project.' then, the 'poor people' could swap this money, knowing it is worth something to others in their community. then, before you know it, people are collecting glass and plastic bottles for swapping either with the refuse people or each other - there are plenty of these thrown away! this is the first step, getting a foot in the door and establishing the new currency, of course.

Then, the wine is gone, and they have something like empty wine bottles to use. these can regulate chicken eggs or other services. eventually, they will have enough bottles to swap in and then get some money for it, which they sell for 'barter currency.' this will begin the new currency having worth, and, in that town, the people that frequent it will realize this and make a lot of investments, which will turn into small businesses and so forth.

The best thing to do after a war is to rebuild, and do that quickly. the best way to rebuild quickly i have often thought was with plastic wood glue to fill holes and piece together roofs with 'cement coatings' and bulldozers to lift the roofs again. to support the buildings, they need to bring in cement pillars that can be set quickly. a lot of the work can be done by the losing side of the war.

But, isn't there a faster way to rebuild? if we were to observe laying bricks or stones, then using 'flame throwers' or lower set blow torches to lock them in place, that would go faster and be just as expensive, like playing lego you could say, yes? this could go really quickly!

And, to lay foundations, we could simply fill the base with water and throw bags of cement in there and have locals stir it with sticks? this will set foundations quickly. to lay a supporting wall next to an already working wall, we could lay cement against it and use wooden boards to set it in place quickly too.

Maybe we could use wooden boards with wooden plastic glue stuff? all these ideas could help rebuild war ravaged areas. of course, laying them with a coat of fire resistant lamination will prevent these things happening again.

It has been in the news in my country lately that some schools 'defy the traditions' of the natives. this would be, most notably, language and hair style codes. this is because they wear school uniforms, of course, and the hair issue could be over with quickly if it were put to an american dress code.

Of course, the main issue is language to be taught in. this could be easily overcome with having different shifts of schooling, where the natives that speak various african languages go in the morning, and the europeans that speak english go in the afternoon. hell, this is doubling the income of the school too!

But let's say that doesn't work out? let's say that they all want to be taught at the same time? this can also be overcome with observing that there are many class rooms in a school, and, that they can be divided into various 'language based classrooms.' this would see, for example, two english classes and two xhosa classes, of course. this might mean some restructuring of the schools kids attend, but it will help them get their grades up.

As for the hair, the hair problem can be overcome by wearing an african or cultural head dress to school. this will keep the hair neat and tidy in 'uniform based schools' and there should be no further complaints over this if that is followed.

There has been a lot of talk about a living wage in my country south africa. i think, if anything needs to change, it is the costs of products rather than the costs of wages. this is because the home owners and owners of factories will be up in arms if we tamper with their wage structure, and, if we were to give the products 'caps,' then we could see the needs and debt of factory and domestic workers, among others, have their lifestyles seen to.

So, how much should a product cost? there are complaints at the moment, but then there always will be. i find that at the moment, there is no people stealing bread from the shops, so, this living wage - or whatever is going on at the moment? - is working. the best policy i have heard of is "if it isn't broken don't fix it," yes?

This brings me to a new area of business - luxury goods. it is no secret that many

=<http://www.forbes.com/sites/ericwagner/2013/09/12/five-reasons-8-out-of-10-businesses-fail/#6c0b87b45e3c>

Here there are five researched reasons why businesses fail;

- [1] No dialogue with customers,
- [2] No uniqueness of products,
- [3] Rambling communications,
- [4] Leadership breakdown,
- [5] Not modeling your business on proven techniques.

Now, these are the forbes list of reasons why these businesses go down. of course, this means a lot of debt for those that need, yes, at least a living wage, yes?

There are supposed to be 400 million entrepreneurs in the world -

How Many People In The World Are Really Entrepreneurs? -

The Asian Entrepreneur

This means that a sizable section of poorer countries are driving the market the wrong way. they get there, they plan for luxury goods to be sold, as that is where the money is, and then they fold, yes? this means that they need to plan properly, maybe with a 'state run scheme' to help them? offering the banks or other sectors to put them under administration due to poor planning could be written into law - why owe money and fold when it can be saved? they will keep their shares and tithe to the institution that will see them through. if the system let's them down, then the system pays up, and, th system run correctly could save these people and others from living below the bread line, of course.

Now, if the market is flooded with the same type of products, there is no competition for that product, as it is a luxury that does not work - nobody can come into a market and peddle a luxury with established businesses with brand power. picture if you will your last visit to the mall with your kids. they say "wow dad, check out that funky new product!" and then you brush it aside because you have never heard of it, deciding instead to get a luxury product with a warranty, yes?

Maybe if the state was to write some rules for banks into law, there will be less waste of money and bankruptcy. remember, the account goes into negative numbers, then pops up at zero with some banking schemes, meaning they have to borrow money and get into debt.

I am also suggesting lowering interest rates. this will encourage lending and entrepreneurship, and, get money circulating again! this is because the bank gives great interest with it's various schemes, and, these schemes keep the money in the bank and not circulating, collecting 'tax moss' as it slowly changes hands due to high interest rates.

Water is something that is getting less and less under climate change, as cold fronts disappear into storms and hurricanes and so forth. if they were to use the trees, you could slowly drain the trees of sap, and filter the sap to make water. this could be done even in the bush, with their 'roots being drained.'

Then, they could also make water out of ice, which you could make with a fridge and solar panel, of course. this could be rather cheap if that is all the fridge does, and, they could be very big, or very numerous.

How does one stop rape? with people that know each other, women can easily find this out by using subliminal questions to see if the person is fantasizing about them and what they would do to make these fantasies come to life. but, with walking in the street, there is a chance of rape by a stranger. mace usually works if they get to it in time, but, they would need to still aim it and use it, which takes a little bit of guts, of course.

I have had many ideas in this area, along with a bracelet that snaps off and emits a high pitched noise to scare rapists away. but, there is still the possibility of rape. self defense only goes so far - what if it is a gang of thugs raping you?

Maybe we need a new idea? there is only prevention to work with, so let's have at it!

If we were to run ad campaigns where we depict unmarried sex as being lowly thought of, then this would be moral and stimulate the populace to be responsible. brain washing is one thing, i am talking about subliminal hypnosis to cure us of this affliction though. maybe everyone would support this, or, the vast majority would?

Otherwise it is nearly impossible to predict where and when rape will happen. it is down to preventing it from happening physically if you ask me, barring hypnosis. maybe a over aggressive woman could bluff her way out of rape? this would see her grab the rapist and make like she wants to kiss him or something? this might scare him away, or, it might make for a lovely experience for the woman, where she has met a dark mysterious stranger and then she gets to use a condom, yes? maybe, maybe not.

Or, she could get undressed if she asks him to wait? the sight of a woman in her underwear is rather off putting, and, it will be like cold water on the loins of the rapist, of course. most of the time he doesn't wear a mask, so, she could look at his face and say that "his finger prints are on her dress" and that she will find him one day?

A lot of the world is in need of water. this is not true for cities that dwell on the coast, as there is room for desalination plants for them in their plans, which are rather cheap. but, how does one get water to people and crops inland? this is quite perplexing, as water limits are usually the only measure that these towns or cities can take.

Maybe if we were to observe that sand carries silicon, and that water makes up a part of silicon, we could take soil and sand and boil it in a barrel or large chamber. then, we could filter the water out of the silicon by reboiling or heating to some degree the silicon that comes from sand.

Mixing this 'sand' with alcohol or even wax or honey or even 'flowers' and pollen will result in water, as will most acids, like those found in fruit.

Another way to make it rain would be to attract and condense clouds to the area. this could be done by using radio signals, of course. the waves could travel around and form clouds around the antenna, high up in the sky, and then condense all the water vapor into a cloud and then into rain, yes?

This could be done by 'polarization.' simply observing the activity of the water vapor, which should have three protons and so forth, would mean that if we release 'electron waves,' they could bring the water vapor near to the antenna, and then make it condense around it and then have it rain.

Of course, this could be set up very quickly. simply a pole that is about a kilometer long, supported by other poles, with a few loose wires on the tip, or, a motherboard of a computer or similar electrical device, and, of course, a cheap fusion generator at the bottom. by computer 'motherboard,' i mean any 'electrical device,' maybe like a 'few heaters?'

If we were to look to industrialization of countries, this would be stepping towards independence economically for that country. this is because everyone wants to work commerce - which leaches off the industrial sector - and they pay big money to process these goods.

If a country wants to become industrialized then it needs to get investors into this area. this can be done by making it lucrative for people to build factories first - to build them before they are put to use is important i think, as then there is a 'grassland for the hunters.'

So, there is a need to build factories. this could be sped up by the state preparing land for sale - it could merely set up auctions of lots of land, investors will come if the price is right. as soon as land is owned it will be developed, as, it is a waste to just sit on empty land. or, the state could charge zero taxation for building from now on, making the building market the biggest in the city for say twenty months while the building is going on. this window will create heavy investment in this area of business. then, they could set up other tax breaks related to building for twenty months to compliment this activity, of course.

If that doesn't work, then they could easily, under the new 'asset based economic worth system,' pay people to build! this would be where the building of the factories or other buildings is paid for by the builders, but, the state pays them the same amount as it would have been taxing them, of course. this will see so much building going on that the asset base of the country will swell to extremes.

I have been following the election problems in gabon, and know that premier bongo is the rightful leader of this state. his opponent, who lost by a narrow margin, senator ping, is trying to get people to strike so that the state stops working and collecting taxes. this will mean a total shut down of food delivery, for example, and then they will get hungry and be out of cash. this will result in more violence, of course, as the resources will be worse distributed.

So, if the people strike, the state needs to fine them for trying to destabilize the state, of course. this is evident as a conspiracy as nobody is going to work. as a new measure to combat this they need to make a 'strong move' for the support of the people. this could be like running a state lottery, or, giving land to those families that lost loved ones. of course, giving them land will attract them to selling land, which means developments and money coming back to the state, same with the lottery, yes?

As for the loss of life, this was minimal. this was because of 'standing up to the state' which is treason, america will agree, terrorism, on a smaller level, and trying to force changes with a mantra of might makes right, of course.

It has come to my attention that when a business goes out of business, it comes down the the state to support the pensioners of that company. now, when in recession, the state will likely be supporting more people's pensions, especially when it comes down to products being replaced or technology 'taking off.'

This is why the state needs to support businesses that are 'winding down.' if a business is losing money or customers, it is up to the state to find them new customers, or, deal with the issues of social security for the pensioners.

I think about twenty percent of people out there are pensioners, so, this means that, say, five percent of the population is supported by 'state pensions.' this means that this money is out of circulation, that the pensioners get the money and return it to the state at various tax points, of course. this means, of course, that this money goes from state to pensioner, then back to the state through taxation - it does not enter circulation really does it?

Maybe if the state was to buy these businesses that are 'going down' or invest in them at least, they will have a chance to make fifty percent of what they spend a year, and, that would be better for the state, as, with paying for these pensions, they need more money to spend, of course.

So, the state should open more banks of it's own. these pensioners can accumulate their pensions from this bank, and, the money they do not spend stays in the bank, where the state, as owners, can draw from it - their own money! - and spend it as they will.

Now, moving all pensioners to 'state banks' would be the ideal outcome for five percent of the population - if the g.d.p. is a trillion a year, as is my country's, then there would be about fifty billion rand or whatever currency you use comparatively or by comparison, 'not moving.'

Economics.

Something just dawned on me - if you pay twenty rand for some shares or some product, and you sell it for eighty rand, you make sixty rand. now, if you buy it back, it will cost you eighty rand, yes? this means that your profit is  $[60] - [20 + 80]$  rand. this means that if you are to buy stocks, you need to hold onto them and not buy them back, as you should not sell them.

Now, observing a market, if you buy some microsoft, mac donalds and samsung shares for twenty rand a piece, you will make money on them, unless you buy them back, of course. same logic applies here. if they go down in price though, say to forty rand, you will spend twenty buying them the first time, forty buying them a second time and have made sixty plus forty plus forty on each deal. so, if you are buying back shares that keep going down in value, this is good income, yes?

If you were to buy shares and buy them back, make sure they have gone down. problem is, if they keep going up and down, you will not make much money. instead, plan ahead! this will be where you buy shares in companies that are related to the company you are investing in, like rubber companies for shoe products. this of course is negligent if you own both companies, as you will be paying yourself, yes?

Think about it, if you buy a rubber company and then a shoe company, the value of the rubber company goes up if you place some orders to yourself! this means you will be paying yourself more, of course. the trick is to only own a few shares in the rubber company, so you are not the owner, of course, making this an incident where you get to pay yourself a greater dividend share! let me explain...

You buy rubber company shares for [30] rand. then you invest in shoe company for [30] rand. this makes the rubber company go up in value, if they have 'more orders.' regardless, rubber will reflect the input to the shoe, meaning that it will be worth more if the shoe company is worth more, yes? this means you get more money for having less shares in the company!

This should be observed as a market lesson - that companies sell shares in their suppliers companies and then reap rewards of investing those shares into customer companies. this will leave the account at + [supplier shares credit], - [customer shares debit], + [order from customer to supplier - connections!]. this is where you are the connection for your own goods, and other people pay you for them!

So, it is good advice to spread your finances far and wide, and, get the orders for the customers done yourself, of course.

Police codes.

We have today had a 'police appreciation day' where the fallen were honored. some of the police could have still been alive if there were more measures in place, of course. these measures could have been for the police to phone ahead to find out what the situation was, and get details while there was someone on the way, yes?

The police are given a lot of power in my country, but, there is less need for power and more need for cooperation if you ask me? of course, if there is to be better service delivery in this sector then there needs to be more safety for the police, who fear as much as anyone else.

Maybe if they were to leave their sirens going as they get there and while they are there, they could scare the people committing the crime, or potential criminals, into cooperating more with the police, as the noise would alert everyone to the authority of the police, of course

Education.

I think there can be some more focus on the education of teens with the 'communist style designation of roles.' this would be where the teen decides they want to enter public service, and, that calls for a scholarship for them, from the state, to become a police person or such. this would mean that the child leaves school to go to a public sector job training facility, where they will get training of a decent grade along with a certain type of public sector style job training scheme.

This is like military school, you could say. we could turn it into a boarding school too. this will defer 'students that get degrees' from working as police for example, yes? this will also prepare students for the public sector, where they can specialize in roles where they are very stressed, of course. the draw for this type of education will be that the fees are low, of course, while the economy will benefit from this type of thing.

Jesus is not sought as much as he should be.

I find that many people out there that call themselves christians when they need to be think they are better than jesus. this is because from an early age in the west it is done that jesus is looked at as a nerdy attachment to themselves. this is because jesus is law abiding and spreads joy, never having an image of a 'bad boy,' yes?

So, you don't like jesus because he was a 'nerd.' he never got into anyone's face, so never stood up for what he believed in. every time you tell teenagers that he flipped out at the gambling in a church they would obviously think that was 'cool,' yes? this is because the people that obey are sheep, those that rebel are seen as leaders. it is no secret that in the west, they also always support overseas rebels - hey wait a minute, always? yes always!

This is due to brainwashing by the media, think of movies where steven seagal kills the bad guys... people love that stuff! so our idea of a hero is a killer that aids rebels, so far, yes? then there is the obsession with having a lingo that he can fall in ranks with the bad guys and underworld... that is definitely not jesus!

On the other hand, women tend to love jesus more, having less of these fantasies about being a bad ass good guy, of course. this means that jesus is a role model of yesteryear, or, we are not good role models, idolizing these values, of course.

War on terror.

The war on terror has been waged for a long time now, with various points of success. of course, it is hard to contain, as the religious people that are quite convincing probably get paid to enlist the youth by twisting the quran to mean something else, and, using media to intoxicate their minds, of course.

What is needed is 'counter brainwashing.' i am not talking about hard line christians going to asia minor, but rather clerics for peace being 'enlisted.' the west and rest of the world, finances pending, could easily budget for a few humanitarian clerics that live there to become street preachers and such, maybe taking to the media outlets and internet to spread messages of love. this would be endorsed by the catholic church maybe if it spreads peace, and, the pope is very convincing - maybe he should also speak?

The message? you cannot bring someone to god that is dead, and, by killing them you are denying them time to listen to you. then, another message might be that they need to work to bring the country forwards, then there will be heaven on earth, or, in their cities? maybe they are trying to bring prosperity to their homelands, but they should not look outside, but rather inside. how can they bomb a market that is making life easier for everybody? this is counterproductive, of course.

Asia minor has a different code of laws to the west. this means people can go to jail for hate speech, and it can be religious. i cannot find anything in the quran that says there needs to be killing to bring people before god, but, this means it must be political, of course?

Think for a moment about the state of things there in asia minor, are they good? does everybody have food to eat? is there rampant crimes? none of these is true, so, it is possible that they are already living in heaven, you could say, with an easy path to 'a blessed afterlife.' how does one enter into heaven unless they live for others? are these people bombing markets ever going to change the law? this is like trying to tame a elephant by sticking needles into it's trunk if you ask me.

An easy way to sweep for bombs is to take a breathalyser and hook it up to a huge power source. this will smell for all drug activity and also alert cops to the presence of bombs in those areas, where they can press a panic button to disperse crowds, of course.

Making the breathalyser sweep for bomb materials would be as simple as observing that the breathalyser needs to pump like a heart - easy to set up? - and then also take in strong smells like gunpowder which contains sulfur or bullets too, as well as manure that is used for home made bombs. this solution should measure 'metals' in the crowd by using an electric field that gets 'zonked' when this comes near it.

Alternatively, they could use magnets to look for large metal objects or bomb detonators, like a thermal scan from the city center, or, each individual market?

Maybe local authorities could observe that offering rewards for information that leads to the capture of the radicals would be offered? how about that anyone sending information to the clerics and with a successful conviction could be blessed by the ayatollah or saudi king or something?

Maybe they could make it so that nobody may take hajj while there is terrorism in the world? this could lead to massive uprooting of radicals by way of everybody being on the lookout for them, of course. or, they could explain that nobody should take hajj without giving three hours of their time to finding radicals?
